

Rep. John Campbell is calling out Sen. Hillary Clinton and other Democrats to help launch the aptly named "Put Your Money Where Your Mouth Is," bill.

Meant more as a political hand grenade lobbed across the aisle rather than an olive branch, Campbell's bill would allow people to make voluntary donations to the federal government above and beyond their normal tax liability.

Campbell said he wrote the bill in response to arguments from the New York presidential hopeful that Americans should pay more taxes.

Campbell invited Clinton to help launch the bill at a news conference in Washington, D.C. today after she said recently that she and other Americans didn't want or need the Bush administration's tax cuts.

"If Warren Buffett or Hillary Clinton think we should pay more taxes, then they should lead by example," he said. "If you're so opposed to the Bush tax cuts, reject them and pay that additional money."

There's no word yet on whether Clinton will take the offer to be part of the event.

The senator was busy working crowds in Pennsylvania on Wednesday in preparation for an April 22 primary, according to The Associated Press.
